Holla!

I am doing a CAI [CustomAirIntake] on my Passator this weekend, and wanted to add a little more pepper to it - I wanted to buy a chip for several months now. Already checked by disassembling the ECU, mine is not soldered so install will be simple.

I am running V-Power 93 Shell always, so gasoline requirements for the chip are not an issue.

The car: 1994 B3 VR, sedan, 5 speed.

No significant performance mods except the open-air filter that I am going to put in it; btw I am running shorter accessory belt cause the whole A/C system I deleted. Result: engine runs cooler - more air hits the radiator, and without the condenser for the A/C more fresh cold clean air gets in the engine compartment.

The desire: we all know the fun on the VR engine starts AFTER 3-4k RPMs.

I want a little bit more torque and power in lower RPMs.

I know that the chip/filter combo will not make it 'fly' but still 😊

I am positive it would make a difference.

The choices:

- TechtonicsTunings - Good price and performance, if you call them they can even customize the chip for you.

- NeuSpeed - Quality brand, a little bit expensive, but not many feedback available?!

- GIAC - Probably the best, but pricey!!

- Any comments?
- Anything else i should know/buy/do?

I am leaning towards the Techtonics, so hit me up with whatever you think guys! Thanks!

I have the TT and although it definitely helps, it seems to me that most of the benefit is above 4000RPM or so. Still it was well worth the investment and certainly feels like it smoothed out the power delivery all around.

I just installed a TT chip in my Passat and results confirm what most say. Tightened up the throttle respose, pulls through the rpm range with a little more oomph. Overall engine "feel" is more "tuned" and happy. How's that for a vague response 😊 Definitely would do it again. Only other mod (other that a ton of fresh OEM parts 😊) is a cone filter.

1993 Pass-It VR6: TT chip, Mobil 1, E-Codes w/relay, Neuspeed springs and Bilstein sport dampers, front strut brace, 17" Flik Arctics in summer, snows-on-stockers in winter, and all that other stuff that's not fun, but has to be done...

You can get the GIAC for no more than $125 at several online sources (but at the moment I can't remember them!) compared to $100 for the TT. These two brands pretty much left Neuspeed in the dust years ago, not many people here would have the Neuspeed chip. What I read from Garrett is that the low and midrange of the VR6 is pretty well mapped at optimum from VW, and that he only found room for improvement in the upper ranges. I doubt you'll find a chip that improves low end pull.

It will be great if you are able to pop a linky for the GIAC at $125. I browsed giacusa.com and they do not sell directly apparently, there are only links to dealers and quite frankly I could not find anything.

well where else is america going to sell their goods. They can't over in america, because everything is sold for cheaper by foreign companies. Anyways back to this chip thing.
What exactly does the chip do for the car after 4000rpms? What kinda mods can you do to the car with this chip? I am a curious newbie in this area.

I'm disappointed that no one has mentioned the Autotech Q-chip. I have one in my '96 GLX, and I'm thrilled. I heard a lot of mixed feedback, about the GIAC chip - some have ran well, and some have caused a lot of 'pinging', on the high-end. As for Autotech, I haven't seen any problems reported, within VW Vortex.

I am one that has complained about pinging. Most of it went away when I installed my grounding kit. Now I am convinced that much of it was due to weak spark or poor signals to the ecu due to poor ground at the cylinder head. The head is the ground for your spark as well as your ecu, however the head itself is very indirectly connected to ground through oily head bolts to the block and then through bolts to the tranny, which is well grounded. Running a direct ground wire to the head was I believe the most important part of the kit.

I don't know why that is. Maybe it differs by ecu revision or between regular chip and the chip for cams, or maybe the numbers are before and after a remapping of the software at some point in time. But it is a nice improvement that makes the car more enjoyable to drive in daily driving.

Allrighty then...

To summarize a bit,
the Techtonics and Garrett give similar performance, that varies by car and whatever else, in the 8-12 HPs range...
However the GIAC tends to have more quality feedback...
Do they do custom settings also, if you call them,
or the chip is pretty standard?

Pretty standard but they have profiles for nitrous, bigger cams, etc. I dont really know how many there are.

Other hand TT will make you a chip for larger injectors for FI and the same all motor stuff GIAC can.

Okay, I think [almost positive!] that I will go with the Garrett chip. Still don't know why here:

<http://www.4induktion.com/giac.html#vw> they say it gives +12 HP for the 92-94 VR, probably because it is specified for Corrado, but I think it is the same thing cause Corrado and Passat in those years share the same engine. May be the difference comes

W Va
94 B3 GLX, 97 GTI, 84
Rabbit GTI, 06 Citroen C5
HDI, 00 Audi A4 1.8TQ, 93
Audi B3 TDI

from the fact that the Corrado is not as heavy as the Passat...dunno!

The other buying place is:
http://www.srsvw.com/parts/par...pro

It is exactly specified for the Passat, same years, VR engine, +8 HPs.

Same price both places, so I just need to spend the money.... 🚗

Thanks A2B4guy for the links!

I saw that one. It clearly shows that the difference starts after 3500k, and the difference is noticeable.

However! I just got off the phone with Shine Racing Service and my chip should be here by Friday, so i can put that and the air filter altogether in the weekend 🍷

I am excited and can't wait to see what the results will be. As I said, I know this won't make the Passator a beast, but still I am eager to see the difference!

The guy from Shine [<http://www.srsvw.com/>] was very helpful. Shipping was only $7 from MA to me, and came in 2 days! It will be probably Sunday before I put it in, because will have to drive with some friends to D.C. on Saturday, and it will take me a while to put the "CAI" in along with the chip.

I have a question though:
How do I put that thingie on the motherboard!?!?!?!?!?!
There is a notch on one end, but which end should go where!?!? 🤔

Essentially that notch matches the notch on your stock chip, you just have to note the stock orientation of the notch and install the new chip the same way. Are you sure GIAC/Shine didn't send instructions with the chip....

I'd be curious to hear about your impressions of that new chip! I actually just bought the affectionately dubbed "Nospeed" chip from a dude on the vortex- haven't installed it yet but figured I couldn't go wrong for 60 bucks. I was aware the nuespeed tuning is less aggressive than most others so we'll see if it does jack...

It all went smooth. No hard time at all, the GIAC fitted perfectly and no CEL whatsoever, knock on wood! 👍

Now, I cannot tell the difference, cause I drove to the movie theater only and was doing 40 mph cause it was snowing as h3ll here 😞
Could not speed the Passator at all!!!@* &% ^@(#&)&
However I have more throat and better response for sure from the air filter I put in...

That I can tell for sure.
 Still ahead to test the Passator on long and fast drive .
